

Rare Chinese Battle Prints Come to the Getty Research Institute

AMY HOOD | JANUARY 17, 2013 | 2 MIN READ

The Getty Research Institute has acquired an extraordinarily rare suite of battle prints from about 1793-99. Known as Ping ding Kuoerke zhan tu, or Pictures of the Campaigns against the Gurkhas (i.e., Nepalese), they depict the successful military campaign of the Qianlong Emperor (reigned 1736–1795) against Nepalese warriors. These large-format copper engravings represent the complete set of prints commissioned by the Qianlong Emperor to commemorate the victory in 1792. Printed in China, this series is one of seven so-called “Conquest” suites.

The scenes show dramatic landscapes of undulating mountains that seem to engulf the troops marching and fighting amidst their peaks and valleys. The plate above depicts the victorious emperor being carried toward a

Ping ding Kuoerke zhan tu, or Pictures of the Campaigns against the Gurkhas (i.e., Nepalese), China, ca. 1793. The Getty Research Institute, 2012.PR.33

Ping ding Kuoerke zhan tu, or Pictures of the Campaigns against the Gurkhas (i.e., Nepalese), China, ca. 1793. The Getty Research Institute, 2012.PR.33

The Chinese prints were inspired by European battle prints, which had been brought to China by the Jesuits or sent as imperial gifts from European courts. In 1765 the Qianlong Emperor ordered prints commemorating his recent victories against the Zhungar troops. Drawings made by Jesuit court artists, including Giuseppe Castiglione, were sent to Paris to be engraved and printed in the royal workshop of Charles-Nicolas Cochin fils. Based on the Qianlong Emperor's satisfaction with this first series, called the Suite des seize estampes représentant les conquêtes de l'empereur de la Chine (Sixteen prints representing the conquests of the emperor of China), additional suites were commissioned from Chinese artists to celebrate other notable military campaigns during his reign. Among the last of Qianlong's print commissions, produced nearly 30 years after the first series, the Ping ding Kuoerke zhan tu, or Pictures of the Campaigns against the Gurkhas (i.e., Nepalese), are traditional Chinese battle depictions that focus on the landscape.

Detail of Chinese emperor Qianlong being carried in triumph from the plate above

These intricate and stunning prints are in near-perfect original condition, and stand out as highly unusual examples of Chinese images executed with European graphic techniques. The Getty's suite is the only complete set in American public collections. At the Research Institute, these understudied prints join a stellar collection of works on paper about China that highlight cross-cultural connections between Europe and China in the early modern era.

Detail of soldiers fighting amidst a lush landscape from the print above

All text on The Iris is copyright J. Paul Getty Trust and licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License, unless marked "All rights reserved." Images and other media are excluded.